TIM TURNER LEAVES FOR WORK ON COAST

Associated Press War Correspondent at El Paso is transferred to the Los Angeles office.

Business of much weeps. Tim Turner is going away.

By order of one Melville E. Stone, Mr. Turner will throw a Horace Greely tip this evening by way of the overland colonnade, which made the original Mr. Turner's enterprise famous.

Turner has been Associated Press—short foot—A. J. correspondents at El Paso for the past year, in charge of the Mexican border situation. Prior to that he held down the sport desk on the El Paso Herald.

Tim and Messrs. Will Taft and Perf. Diaz, the two ex-champ, heavyweights of the U. S. and Mexico, blew into El Paso at the same time on one October 14, 1903. Tim came from Grand Rapids, where they make furniture. Taft from the home of the Bryan cocktail and Diaz from the incubator of revolution. Tim wore a form fitting overcoat, and a band booted hat. His first assignment on the "S. G. N."—meaning the Southwest's greatest newspaper—was to interview governor Tom Campbell and his fuzzy tie hat, which he did for a column. Turner was Mexico reporter for The Herald during the days preceding the Madero revolution and pulled a good one when he asked poor little Pancho Madero (deceased) how he liked his beans, at Guadalupe, when the little leader first took the field. Turner was in at the battle of Juarez and the subsequent retreat. He was city editor for the morning paper for a short time and then returned to his first love as sporting editor of The Herald.

In 1912 he was appointed resident correspondent for the Associated Press and has been in charge of the border bureau here since. He has been transferred to the Los Angeles office of the A. P. in charge of the Mexican bureau. Before coming to El Paso, Mr. Turner was attached to the staffs of Memphis and Grand Rapids newspapers, and his father, W. H. Turner, was one of the big newspaper men of the middle west. Mrs. Turner will visit relatives in Colorado before joining her husband in Los Angeles.
